It studies the deployment of dynamics to explain the co-evolution of economic and environmental systems. The authors also explore how technological innovation drives sustainability goals, and demonstrate the importance of working at sector level rather than at aggregated national level.

In this article we study the endogenous evolution and dynamics of environmentalism. By environmentalism we mean a certain attitude towards the environment that translates into a green behavior. Our approach here is based on the recent literature of cultural dynamics, especially on two papers by Bisin and Verdier, 1998, Bisin and Verdier, 2001. They derive cultural dynamics of preferences and norms through a transmission of social interactions across generations.

INTRODUCTION. The advent of network theory in ecology and environmental studies has greatly advanced the study of ecological dynamics and complexity (1, 2).These advances have also translated into a growing knowledge of how human-caused disturbances can create far-reaching ecological impacts through indirect effects (3–6).Often, however, the disturbances in these network studies have been ...

Environmental Values (journal) Miller, Clark A. “The Dynamics of Framing Environmental Values and Policy: Four Models of Societal Processes.”.

Environmental Values 9, no. 2 (2000): 211–33. doi:10.3197/096327100129342047. While the subject of framing has achieved considerable recognition recently among social scientists and policy analysts, less attention has been given to how societies arrive at stable, collective frames of meaning for environmental values and policy.
