Designers created settings for group activities in response to two social concerns. In mid-nineteenth century America, the family was perceived as threatened by the vices of modern city life. Park promoters hoped to reinforce the family by providing a setting for family activities.

Changing Roles of Urban Parks | SPUR

Heidegger's body of philosophy should be of great interest to geographers in their attempts to understand themselves as part of the studies of the interaction between man and world. This is what hermeneutic phenomenology is all about, and is what geographers such as Edward Relph, Yi-Fu Tuan and John Pickles try to tell us in their many works on humanism, phenomenology and geography.
