Mechanisms of Lymphocyte Activation and Immune Regulation ...

Activation is carried out through a cell-to-cell interaction that occurs between a protein called the CD40 ligand, which appears on the surface of the activated helper T cells, and the CD40 protein on the B-cell surface. The helper T cell also secretes cytokines, which can interact with the B cell and provide additional stimulation.

Immune system - Activation of T and B lymphocytes | Britannica

The kinetics of the potentiation of phytohaemagglutinin-induced DNA synthesis by rat lymph node cells in the presence of non-mitogenic lymphocyte activating factor produced by rat peritoneal macrophages in serum-free cultures was studied. LAF, a dialysed 24 h supernatant of partially purified macrophages, caused a maximal potentiating effect when added to lymph node cell cultures between 0 and 24 h after their initiation.

Mechanisms of action of `Lymphocyte activating factor' (LAF)

Two independent signals are required by lymphocytes for a complete activation. A preliminary antigen-specific signal is sent through antigen receptors: T-cell receptor (TCR) on T-cells and surface Ig on B-cells. A second signal is known as co-stimulation that is independent of the antigen receptor and is imperative for a complete activation.

Because each lymphocyte possesses single antigen specificity, antigen-specific responses begin with the recognition by and activation of a single cell and consequently the cells proliferate, a process called clonal expansion and selection many years ago by Macfarlane Burnet. 1 To understand the mechanism of antigen-specific activation of lymphocytes, it is necessary to study how a single cell of relevant specificity recognizes the antigen and induces its activation to mediate
