The pads are fitted in the calliper with their friction material almost touching the two sides of the brake disc. When the brake pedal is pressed, hydraulic fluid in the calliper pushes each brake pad against each side of the rotating brake disc. This results in friction being produced, which slows down and stops the vehicle.

Your car’s brake discs take some punishment, which means that they can wear out over time. This can cause an annoying squealing sound or, in more worrying circumstances, feel your car pull to one side. Your car brake discs should be checked every 10,000 miles. A brake check is part of any MOT or service but is simple enough to do at home and if you notice any problems, replacing worn-out brake discs and other brake parts like pads is simple enough for the home mechanic.
