Space-time block coding is a technique used in wireless communications to transmit multiple copies of a data stream across a number of antennas and to exploit the various received versions of the data to improve the reliability of data transfer. The fact that the transmitted signal must traverse a potentially difficult environment with scattering, reflection, refraction and so on and may then be further corrupted by thermal noise in the receiver means that some of the received copies of ...

The Golden code is a particular case of a class of codes known as perfect space-time block codes [DV05]. These codes are $n_t \times n_t$ linear block codes which are characterized by the following properties: 1. they are full rate ($r_s = n_t$), 2. they have a non-vanishing determinant, 3. they are constructed from cyclic division algebra, 4.

Space-time block coding (STBC) is mainly used to gain on robustness and reliability. Multiple radio chains will be used to send multiple times the same data or the bits of the same data over different antennas. This ensures that the same data is sent through different paths and it will also be received different times on multiple antennas.
