Gouache, on the other hand, has larger particles and more body, so it looks heavier, denser, and more opaque after it dries. The paint is best used to create a flat wash of color that dries matte.

Because it dries so quickly, gouache is ideal for gestural, action, and direct paintings.

Wash the watercolour paint gently with a clean brush and water to flush the gouache residue away. So, in short, using gouache with watercolour is fine, as long as you keep them separate on the palette. And as for using them together in a painting, the old adage of 'less is more' very much applies here!
