No industry standard has defined or clarified how developers can use Java class files from other programming languages. Scripting languages haven't had a standard, industry-supported way to integrate with Java technologies. However, as Bob Dylan once said, " the times, they are a changin'." One change is Java Specification Request (JSR) 223, which helps developers integrate Java technology and scripting languages by defining a standard framework and application programming interface (API) to ...

By embedding scripts in your Java code, you can customize and extend the Java application. For example, you can have configuration parameters, business logic, math expressions, and other external parts written as scripts. When developing your Java application, you do not need to choose the scripting language. If you write your application with the Java Scripting API (defined by JSR 223), then users can write scripts in any language compliant with JSR 223. See The Java Scripting API.
