Prior to the introduction of IEC 60950 (or its brief predecessor IEC 950), manufacturers were often faced with country based standards that were not harmonized, which made it difficult to design a global product. The introduction of harmonized standards was welcomed by manufacturers, as it simplified developing products for a global marketplace.

What happens when IEC 60950-1 is withdrawn?

EN 60950 is the Product Safety testing standard for “Information Technology Equipment” (known as ITE). It is in the process of being replaced by EN 62368:2014 which was recently published in the European Union Official Journal as an approved standard to show compliance under the Low Voltage Directive.
