Introduction Fans of the Rover 600 will tell you it's a more stylish option, and of all the 'Ronda' collaborative cars, it's the one that most successfully made the transition from Japanese to 'British'. There's no denying that the 600 remains a great looking, understated, saloon, which in the right colour can still turn heads.

During Rover's productive years, one of their leading models was the 75, a saloon which managed to be refined, practical and powerful. While much of the Rover range now risks appearing aged and dated, the 75 retains an element of style to it; largely due to it being one of the last models in production. Smaller than the 75 is the 25, an updated version of the 200, and a compact yet spacious ...
