The German Ideology / Theses on Feuerbach / Introduction ...

In the German Ideology, Marx and Engels offer up the possibility that one can address the real conditions of human existence, outside of ideological mystification. The premises from which we begin are not arbitrary ones, not dogmas, but real premises from which abstraction can only be made in the imagination.

Introduction to Karl Marx, Module on Ideology

The German Ideology • Unlike Spencer, who favored laissez-faire capitalism (little interference from the state) and saw the Industrial Revolution (IR) as a good thing (saw it as power leaving the state and going into the hands of business)… • Marx saw the IR as allowing for the exploitation of many (proletariat) by the hands of the affluent few (bourgeoisie) • Marx saw material ...

Cultural Reader: The German Ideology / Marx - summary ...

First, Marx and Engels are railing against German Idealism’s view that consciousness creates the world, that consciousness has an independent existence, and that ideas have instantiations in the world, a view that sees the history of ideas as giving us a history of the world. Ideas, therefore, for the Young Hegelians, would change the world.

Notes on “The German Ideology” | Territorial Masquerades

False consciousness is a term used—primarily by Marxist sociologists—to describe ways in which material, ideological, and institutional processes are said to mislead members of the proletariat and other class actors within capitalist societies, concealing the exploitation intrinsic to the social relations between classes. Friedrich Engels (1820-1895) used the term "false consciousness" in ...
