The typical basketball goal at a home is a mobile goal on a pole with a water-filled plastic base or a hard-mounted goal attached to an object like a tree. Bolting the hoop and backboard directly to the tree can easily damage the tree which may lead to rot and decay. The best option is to build a removable frame for the hoop and backboard that will grasp the tree in a vice-like clamp without damaging it.

Hoop tree saddles are supposed to fit this way. When fitting a hoop tree, we use the term "adequate" clearance - this means that the balance of the saddle is correct, and that at no time does the saddle come in contact with the withers/spine. The fitting basics are still the same, no matter what tree type the horse requires.
