When your newborn baby seems to do little but sleep and feed, you might be surprised to learn that they're actually starting to develop their social skills. Babies show signs that they're naturally inclined to being with and interacting with others soon after they're born (Happe and Frith, 2014). Even babies who are a few days old prefer looking at face-like patterns than at other sorts of patterns (Johnson, 2011). And they're already noticing whether people are looking at them.
