Most musicians would define a lead sheet as follows: a simple music score showing only the originally composed melody line of a song / composition, and chord symbols representing the chord changes of a song / composition. In the case of popular songs played in the jazz community, a lead sheet often includes the words to the song.

A lead sheet lets the melodist know what to play, though if it’s a simple tune like a Great American Songbook tune the melody is usually up for some interpretation with phrasing, adding notes, changing rhythms, etc. NO ONE plays a standard melody exactly like it’s written. If it’s a more complicated jazz original (I’m making the distinction between the Great American Songbook/standards and jazz originals) like a bebop tune then the melody is generally played much closer to the original.
