During the period from around October to February, Earth's orbital speed is much faster than at any other time of year. This changing speed affects the position of the sun in the sky and how much earlier or later the sun reaches its noon position. The result is the analemma, a figure-eight shaped path of the sun in the sky over the course of a year. This year-long activity is designed to make visible this remarkable aspect of the Earth-sun system, one of the most striking patterns in nature.
