Most insects should exhibit behaviour involving approach, identification, and copulation. Yet, whereas male fruit flies (Drosophila) often have elaborate displays preceding copulation, male houseflies and blowflies (Musca) simply fly at any object of the proper size and attempt to copulate with it. The reason for these differences in behaviour may be that some insects do not require courtship.

You have probably seen a clear example of innate insect behavior called the dorsal light reaction. Flying insects will sense the direction of light coming from the sun and fly in a way that keeps the sun overhead, or on their dorsal side. This is a means for the insect to maintain a flight plan that is parallel to the ground.
