Here are all the modern-day cults that are the definition of creepy. Modern humanity has adopted the practice of forming cult followings. We think of things like TV shows or video games that aren't necessarily financial successes, but are intensely admired by a group of people as having a cult following. It's truly a modern comfort that groups like these are often what we mean by “cult” when we use it in conversation these days.

To truly force the Cult of Corona down the throats of the people, the competition must be eliminated, whether it's “traditional” religion or logic, reason and the (real) scientific method. Deprogramming the world from the Cult of Corona cannot be done by force – its backers have too much power, including total control of both establishment and social media.

Corona Cultists the Modern-Day Cult of Corona.

One of the most notorious cults of the modern era, Raëlism began in 1974 with a Frenchman named Claude Vorilhon. Calling himself Rael, Vorilhon claimed he had a vision of an alien spacecraft in southern France that was full of beings who told him humans were the future and handed him a Bible.

From the archive: The cargo cult of modern office design. The idea of the cargo cult derives from anthropological observations made about the behaviour of societies that encounter more technologically advanced societies. In particular it is rooted in those rituals and objects created by Pacific islanders in an attempt to attract modern goods and technology and generally earn favour with people who they thought could prevent terrible events.
