Amendments such as compost, manure, peat, lime and organic fertilizer are simply added to the top of the garden beds, and over time they will be incorporated into the subsoil by watering and the activity of subsoil organisms. There is no need to dig anything into the soil. With ‘no-till’ gardening, weeding is largely eliminated. The use of mulch blocks soil-borne weeds from emerging, and any weeds which do emerge are easy to pull out because the soil is always moist.

Straw would work well too but for us the grass is free. I didn't come up with this method. Ruth Stout wrote a book called Gardening without Work (really that is the name!) about her method and I stumbled on it when we moved into this house. She’s a hoot to read even if you don’t put grass on your garden and other crazy things.
