Why Don't Penguins' Feet Freeze?: And 114 Other Questions ...

Penguin's feet don't freeze, but they are often very, very cold. Penguins need bare feet so they can walk without slipping and to help steer them when swimming. Penguins often avoid their feet getting too cold by hunching down so that their belly feathers cover their feet, or by rocking back onto their heels and tail to lift their feet off the ice. They also have counter-current heat exchangers that regulate their foot temperature to keep them at least just above freezing.

Why don't penguins' feet freeze? - How It Works

Those naked bird feet may look positively frigid, but their special circulation acts as a kind of antifreeze to keep them just warm enough that they don't freeze. Penguins legs and feet have evolved to lose as little heat as possible. Penguin feet hold onto heat by restricting blood flow in really cold weather, keeping foot temperature just above freezing.

Why Penguin Feet Don't Freeze | HowStuffWorks

When the penguin is too warm, the opposite happens and the arteries allow more blood flow to the feet, cooling them off. Besides this built in mechanism, a more mundane way the penguin can control their feet's temperature is simply to huddle down around their feet so that their body is keeping them more protected and warm.

Why Penguins' Feet Don't Freeze - Today I Found Out

If their feet were too warm, they would waste lots of energy. If they get too cold, the amount of warm blood flowing to the feet can also be increased by widening the diameter of the arteries running to the feet. This is called vaso-dilation. Fascinating - thanks for the question <(") - this is meant to be a penguin!!
