A protective coating is a layer of material applied to the surface of another material with the intent of inhibiting or preventing corrosion. A protective coating may be metallic or non-metallic. Protective coatings are applied using a variety of methods, and can be used for many other purposes besides corrosion prevention.

What is a Protective Coating? - Definition from Corrosionpedia

The coating system will still provide corrosion protection (just not as well as a system with a zinc-rich coating) and is easy to apply. Epoxies are also surface tolerant, meaning they can be applied over a tightly adhering rusted surface that couldn't be blasted down to bare steel (making them a viable choice for re-coating jobs).

Corrosion prevention and protection methods for structural ...

Corrosion can be prevented by removing one of these conditions. Coating a metal surface with paint or enamel provides a barrier between the metal and the moisture in the environment. The process of coating a metal surface with another metal that is more likely to be oxidized is referred to as sacrificial coating.

1. Barrier Coatings. One of the easiest and cheapest ways to prevent corrosion is to use barrier coatings like paint, plastic, or powder. Powders, including epoxy, nylon, and urethane, are heated to the metal surface to create a thin film. Plastic and waxes are often sprayed onto metal surfaces. Paint acts as a coating to protect the metal surface from the electrochemical charge that comes from corrosive compounds.

Epoxy coatings are also used for coating propeller blades, providing abrasion resistance and corrosion protection. Zinc chromate is a pigment used in different formulations for corrosion resistance, which is added to primers of alkyds, polyurethanes, and epoxies. However, it is restricted by regulators as a carcinogenic substance.

Aviation Coatings for Corrosion Prevention

Protective coatings are widely used and considered extremely effective corrosion control systems when they're applied appropriately. And it's not merely paint, as any continuous film forming a barrier between metal and the environment is considered a protective coating that slows the electrochemical reactions responsible for corrosion.
