Multiword units: Idioms and Collocations Roughly speaking, idioms are expressions whose meaning cannot be completely understood from the meanings of the component parts. For example, whereas it is possible to work out the meaning of (a) on the basis of knowledge of English grammar and the meaning of words, this would not be sufficient to work out that (b) can mean something like 'If Sam dies ...

Multiword units: Idioms and Collocations

Multi-word expressions (MWEs) are complex lexical units, for example verbal idioms (bite the bullet) or frozen adverbials (all at once). Others, such as particle verbs (stick out) or complex nominals (day-care center), indicate a close relationship between MWEs and word-formation units. Focusing on this

25. Multi-word expressions

There are four major kinds of multiword units: (1) A multiword unit can be a group of words that commonly occur together, like 'take a chance'; (2) it can be a group of words where the meaning of the phrase is not obvious from the meaning of the parts, as with 'by and large' or 'be taken in' (be tricked); (3) it can simply refer to all the combinations of a particular word or type of word and its accompanying words whether they are highly frequent, strongly associated, or not ...

A number of properties of MWEs, recognised both in linguistic theory and in NLP, distinguish them from single-word lexical units. Their most obvious characteristic – that they consist of two or more parts, or words – has various consequences for their treatment in dictionaries and in NLP lexicons. Individual elements within MWEs can be limited to particular forms in their (morphological) paradigms.
