Expression of a recombinant protein can be approached in general by constructing a plasmid that encodes the desired protein, introducing the plasmid into the required host cell, growing the host cells and inducing protein expression, and then lysing the cells, purifying the protein, and performing SDS-PAGE analysis to verify the presence of the protein (see figure Generation of recombinant proteins).

Protein - QIAGEN

Membrane proteins are pivotal players in biological processes. In order to understand how a membrane protein works, it is important to purify the protein to fully characterize it. Membrane proteins are difficult to purify because they are present in low levels and they require detergents to become soluble in an aqueous solution.

However, due to their unique physical properties and requirement for association with cellular membranes, expression of membrane proteins in heterologous systems is often daunting. Cellular expression of recombinant membrane protein often results in protein aggregation and misfolding due to the hydrophobic nature of transmembrane segments.
