Manual Focus

Manual focusing was no better and no worse than on the film cameras themselves. We used loupes on the ground glass of the view cameras, and that was only fairly successful; stopping down a lot covered up our errors, and the slow lenses we used didn't have bad focus shift. For the film cameras, it was worse, since by that time the manual focusing aids formerly employed in film SLRs were being ...

Manually focusing the Fujifilm GFX 50S - Kasson

Manual focusing will avoid this completely and allow you to get things just right – focusing upon the subject behind that glass or fence. If you do this in conjunction with a large aperture (which decreases depth of field) and get in close to the fence or glass you might well eliminate it completely from being noticeable in your shot.
