Chromosome engineering is "the controlled generation of chromosomal deletions, inversions, or translocations with defined endpoints." By combining chromosomal translocation, chromosomal inversion, and chromosomal deletion, chromosome engineering has been shown to identify the underlying genes that cause certain diseases in mice. In coming years, it is very likely that chromosomal engineering will be able to do the same identification for diseases in humans, as well as all other organisms.

A normal chromosome has one centromere — the part of the chromosome that’s required for chromosome segregation during cell division. It helps provide a kind of handle for moving chromosomes: The segregation machinery grabs on to the handle to pull the chromosome into one of the daughter cells. Dicentric chromosomes instead have two centromeres.
