This is what is called a contradiction in TRIZ jargon. For instance, if you want to build a faster engine, you lose fuel efficiency. This contradiction is the general problem that an organization faces and must be used as an input to the TRIZ matrix. Determine Improvement and Degradation: The next step would be to explicitly state the trade-off. In the above case one can look at speed as the improvement parameter while fuel efficiency as the parameter which must not be degraded.

Triz is helpful when uncovering contradictions. A contradiction is when you have conflicts in what you want: either you want opposites of the same thing (a Technical Contradiction), or as you improve something, something else gets worse (a Physical Contradiction). When uncovering and solving contradictions, follow these simple steps:

TRIZ Matrix / 40 principles / TRIZ contradictions table

One of the tools which evolved as an extension of the 40 principles was a contradiction matrix in which the contradictory elements of a problem were categorized according to a list of 39 factors which could impact on each other. The combination of each pairing of these 39 elements is set out in a matrix (for example, the weight of a stationary object, the use of energy by a moving object, the ...
