Product life cycle thinking can promote long-term rewarding in contrast to short-term profitability rewarding. It helps management to understand the cost consequences of developing and making a product and to identify areas in which cost reduction efforts are likely to be most effective. Very often, 90% of the product's life-cycle costs are determined by decisions made in the development stage. Therefore, it is important to focus on these costs before the product enters the market.

Using lifecycle costing not only helps organisations to better determine profitability, but also enables the kind of decision-making that results in higher profitability. With conventional costing, it can be easy to overlook the costs of things like research and disposal, meaning that total costs can creep higher than revenue.
