Relationship between Democracy and Education

Concern for academic excellence and equity often structures the work of mainstream policy analysts. These matters certainly deserve careful attention, but this focus often obscures many other important concerns. In particular, analysts are often inattentive to the relation between educational policy and the creation of democratic communities.

Reframing education narratives in this way may enable more citizens to question dominant economic narratives and bring other values into clearer perspective. For example, a parent who deems childrens' happiness as important may decide to support a school levy or budget to fund extracurricular activities that bring children joy, even though it is costly to taxpayers and may not deliver specific job skills.
