The same applies, I think, to distributed cognitions. The individual has been dismissed from theoretical considerations, possibly as in antithesis to the excessive emphasis on the individual by traditional psychological and educational approaches. But as a result the theory is truncated and conceptually unsatisfactory.

Salomon on Distributed Cognition - New Learning Online

Distributed cognition is an approach to cognitive science research that deploys models of the extended mind (see, for example, the paper The Extended Mind) by taking as the fundamental unit of Distributed Cognitions: Psychological and Educational ...

In contrast to real-world environments, “typical psychological and educational practices treat the person in a way that is much closer to person-solo” (p.94). And Perkins feels this is misguided, for two reasons: (1) person-nearly-solo is not “lifelike”; and (2) distributing cognition is an art and needs practice, something schools should provide.
