Preserving Nature in the National Parks - George Wright

Whether current and succeeding congresses and presidential administrations—and the National Park Service itself—will have the vision and determination to perpetuate the Natural Resource Challenge (or some future similarly aggressive science-based endeavor) depends most fundamentally on how much the American public values preserved national parks—landscapes kept intact both scenically and ecologically to the extent possible.

The charge to leave the parks "unimpaired" in effect perpetuated the charge to preserve "natural conditions" as stated in the 1872 Yellowstone legislation and subsequent national park enabling acts. And as "unimpaired" set the 1916 mandate's only actual standard, it became the principal criterion against which preservation and use of national parks have ever since been judged.

Preserving Nature in the National Parks: A History (Chapter 2)

Mather and other supporters of the National Park Service have sometimes been identified as "aesthetic conservationists," concerned about preserving lands for their great scenic beauty-as opposed to the "utilitarian conservationists" exemplified by Gifford Pinchot and the Forest Service, who sought sustained consumptive use of natural resources. Certainly, through its determined efforts to preserve the scenic facade of nature, the Park Service under Mather focused on aesthetic conservation.
