The commands to store your title data can be used in the preamble. Since `\maketitle` does actual output, it needs to be used after `\begin{document}`. Usually, the title is the first thing in a document. Please see examples for KOMA-script and memoir classes below. Both provide (different) commands to change the appearance of the title.

Compare the control effort required in both cases. In general, the farther you move the poles to the left, the more control effort is required. Note: If you want to place two or more poles at the same position, place will not work. You can use a function called `acker` which achieves the same goal (but can be less numerically well-conditioned):

Let's assume we have a batch file called `Find.cmd` which has the following code. In the code, we have clearly mentioned that we if don't find the file called `lists.txt` then we should set the `errorlevel` to 7.

Similarly, if we see that the variable `userprofile` is not defined then we should set the `errorlevel` code to 9.
