Vursell Memorial Award from the Academy of Arts and Letters and her stories have been featured in The Best American Short Stories, O’Henry Prize Stories, Pushcart Prize Stories, and the series Selected Shorts.

Maxine Swann | Author

Flower Children is a series of linked short stories written by Swann over the course of a decade, published ten years before in Ploughshares. The stories are written from different points of view; the first chapter follows a collective, fused third person, i.e. the "they" of the children growing up; others are told in the first person by Maeve, whom, given the parallels between Swann's fiction and her life, the reader may assume to be her proxy.

Flower children, Maxine Swann

That's probably why I found a certain poetic truth in Maxine Swann's Flower Children, the story of four children coming of age in 1980s rural Pennsylvania. Their parents, who had turned their backs on their upper-class roots a decade earlier, are making a go of it as hippies, attending protest rallies and building a house with a dirt-floor kitchen.

Flower children, Maxine Swann

I highly recommend Maxine Swann's Flower Children. It's a very quick read - less a novel than interlocking short stories about children raised by hippie parents. The narrative voice ranges from chapter to chapter - from the plural (we) to a third person narrator to the voice of one of the daughters, and though this kind of transition usually bugs me, it works here.
