This shocking image, a conflated objectification of both woman and animal, stands as a central example of the concerns of Ecofeminism: Feminist Intersections with Other Animals and the Earth. Editor Carol J. Adams reads "Ursula" as an example of "anthropornography" (the sexualising and feminising of animals) and contextualises the photograph within the history of the reclining nude, reading a parallel construction of the body for consumption (209).

Ecofeminism and Intersectional Environmentalism both advocate for social and environmental justice, with a few nuances that differentiate the two: one is a type of environmentalism that explores the relationship between women and nature while the other also advocates for feminism, but is broader in its representation.

The Difference

Also called ecological feminism, ecofeminism can be defined as a multiple set of interconnected theories and practices that embraces animal, environmental, and feminist studies and remains united by the very fundamental categories of its approaches: women, animals, and environment. The relationship between these categories is basically established through a chain of domination, exploitation, and oppression that affects both.
