Abstract: Based on the example of a bob- bin tool Friction Stir Welding process model a technique to model thermal processes with a moving geometry in COMSOL is introduced. The described approach allows to model the transient temperature elds in setups that are governed by a large relative movement of dif- ferent parts of the geometry.

Friction stir welding, using zero down force, has been successfully demonstrated at TWI on aluminium plate up to 25mm. The technique uses a 'floating' bobbin shaped tool and penetrates the joint line either directly, or from a milled recess, in the material's edge. Successful demonstrations have shown that thick section friction stir welds up to 25mm can be performed using TWI's large purpose-built FSW machine.

Since the bobbin tool is free to move up and down, throughout the welding operation, it naturally takes up a vertical position where the top and bottom shoulder forces are equal. This feature also compensates for any misalignment between the tool and the material. For further information please email contactus@twi.co.uk.

'Floating' bobbin tool eliminates FSW shoulder forces - TWI

The bobbin tool operates within a sleeve which provides vertical guidance and the rotational drive via a keyway.The floating bobbin stir welding technique mitigates against root defects and eliminates the need of a backing bar. Typically, bobbin stir welding causes less distortion than conventional FSW due to a more balanced heat input.

then sheared around the tool and forms a weld. The conventional tool design consists of a shoulder and a pin. A second class of tools, called bobbin tools, includes a second shoulder attached to the end of the pin (see fig. 1). Figure 1. Overview of the FSW process using a bobbin tool. These tools have some advantages over conventional tools.

Floating-Bobbin Friction Stir Welding. Bobbin tools were developed to overcome some of the difficulties encountered in conventional friction stir welding (FSW), such as the need for a backing bar and the potential to generate root defects in the weld. Along with the complete elimination of root flaws, lower distortion joints are produced compared with conventional FSW, due to a balanced weld profile.

Floating-Bobbin Friction Stir Welding - TWI

Friction stir welding (FSW) is a widely used solid state joining process for soft materials such as aluminium alloys because it avoids many of the common problems of fusion welding. Commercial feasibility of the FSW process for harder alloys such as steels and titanium alloys awaits the development of cost effective and durable tools which lead to structurally sound welds consistently.
