Protestant Worship And Church Architecture

Protestant religious architecture, or rather French Protestant religious architecture, is very varied. There is no one particular architectural style but rather several characteristics which reappear from one century to another and from one style to another; the banning of religious statues and paintings, a reorganization inside the church itself which lays the emphasis on the pulpit and the communion table rather than the altar, the fact that churches are full of light because of the large ...

Protestant Worship And Church Architecture By James F White

In the countryside between about 1560 and 1830 most church building was devoted to making churches suitable for the Protestant worship introduced at the Reformation. At first alterations were restricted to providing a wooden communion table and rails round it at which communicants could kneel instead of a stone altar, installing a pulpit from which sermons could be preached, and replacing figurative wall paintings with whitewash and biblical texts.
