Flying some 240 miles above Earth's surface at 17,500 miles an hour, the International Space Station (ISS) is a science laboratory dedicated to helping humans learn how to live in space.

Crucially, that means figuring out how the space environment affects biology-and human bodies, especially.

What the International Space Station teaches us about our ...
Despite this, it is fair to say that exploring the cosmos – from landing on the Moon and imaging the solar system to sending robots to Mars and detecting the first planets beyond our own star system – is one of humanity’s most significant enterprises, and one that is only just coming into its own.

Look Up examines the age of cosmic exploration - Physics World
So it begins - Space Exploration through the 1950s. Despite man just starting to fully turn his attention to space, the 1950s saw some of the biggest achievements in Space history. So far. In 1957, Russia launched Sputnik 1 into space, marking the official beginning of the space age! Even though there are now over 500 working satellites in orbit, Sputnik will remain forever special.
