Wards Transformation Of E Coli

Estimated class/lab time required: 45 minutes over 2 days. Transformation, a fundamental technique of genetic engineering, involves the induced uptake of foreign DNA by a host cell. Based on the gene (s) encoded by the introduced DNA, transformation may confer a new trait or traits to the host cell. Using a plasmid which carries a gene for antibiotic resistance to ampicillin, students investigate one mechanism of bacterial transformation into wild-type E.coli cells.

Transformation in Escherichia coli: Stages in the Process

Transformation could occur naturally in some bacteria such as Escherichia coli. There are two types of transformation, natural and artificial transformation. Natural transformation happens when bacteria cells take in DNA naturally through the cell membrane whereas artificial transformation occurs when the recipient cells are forced to take in DNA by chemical or enzymatic treatment (Lorenz & Wackernagel, 1994).

Transformation of Escherichia Coli (E. Coli)

Using a jellyfish gene that codes for a green fluorescent protein (GFP), students transform a harmless laboratory strain of E. coli. The bacteria cultured will then express the GFP jellyfish trait. The uncomplicated process implemented here ensures success and helps students understand how gene transfer is applied across medicine and biology.

Ward's® Improved Bacterial

Transformation Using GFP Lab ...

Transformation can occur naturally but the incidence is extremely low and is limited to relatively few bacterial strains. These bacteria can take up DNA only during the period at the end of logarithmic growth. At this time, the cells are said to be competent. Competence can be induced in E. coli with carefully controlled chemical growth conditions.

Rapid Colony Transformation of E. coli with Plasmid DNA

Since the natural competency of E. coli is very low or even nonexistent, the cells need to be made competent for transformation by heat shock or by electroporation. The protocols for preparing competent cells vary by whether transformation is to be achieved via heat shock or electroporation.

Genetic transformation was studied by taking transformed and untransformed Escherichia Coli (E. coli) and placing them on various media to observe gene expression via growth and color under UV light. For E. coli, electroshock transformation is the most efficient method available and approaches the theoretical maximum frequency of 100% cell transformation (9, 18, 71). An electroshock is generated by the discharge of a high-voltage capacitor through a mixture of bacterial cells and DNA suspended between two electrodes.
