FEMALE EX-COMBATANTS, PEACE, AND REINTEGRATION ...
As warring parties dissolve and large numbers of ex-combatants are released into civilian life, society is faced with three main challenges: a) ex-combatants often pose a threat to post-war security, b) the atrocities committed by ex-combatants may create severe tensions with civilians who have suffered at their hands, and c) certain groups of weak and marginalized ex-combatants may need special assistance for humanitarian reasons.

Reintegrating Ex-Combatants

Although some ex-combatants may wish not to associate with their former comrades-in-arms in an effort to break ties with their old selves and carve out fully new identities, others may naturally turn to fellow fighters—those who may have been their main friends and trusted confidants for the past several years—for economic and social support amid the uncertainty of the post-war context. Finally, as ex-combatants are eager to establish new identities and become trusted members of their ...

It shows that each of the three categories of ex-combatants has different responses to security and violence in post-conflict period. It further argues that exploring the interface between various categories of ex-combatants, their re-mobilization vulnerability and the position and interest of re-mobilizing actors can better predict the outcomes of the ex-combatants violence.

Ex-combatants, Security and Post-conflict Violence ...

The case of post-conflict Côte d'Ivoire shows that the greatest risk to peace and stability comes from ex-combatants with the closest ties to political power, rather than from those who feel disgruntled and side-lined. It shows that ex-combatants who are closer to political power engage in highly destabilising forms of political engagement, while those farther away, or out of favour, have restricted their actions.
