The lateral line systems of larval caecilians of the genus Ichthyophis possess two types of elements, free neuromasts and ampullary organs. Free mechanoreceptive neuromasts are typical of those found in other vertebrates, and are arranged in series roughly homologous to neuromast groups in many other fishes and amphibians. In contrast to other amphibians, Ichthyophis larvae possess only one ...

It may be concluded that the mechanosensory lateral line system is ancestral for craniates (including hagfishes and vertebrates), and that electroreception is ancestral for vertebrates (including lampreys and gnathostomes). Many peripheral (cranial nerves) and central nervous commonalities are noted for the two sensory systems.

The Central Nervous Organization of the Lateral Line System

The "lateral line" or "lateralis" system has been used as an umbrella term to describe what originally (without the aid of modern anatomical techniques) looked like a series of pits, grooves, and lines on the head and trunk of fishes and some amphibians.

Finally, this review covers the recently documented roles of the lateral line system in natural behaviors, including courtship and prey capture. Some of these recent studies have led to the exciting conclusion that the lateral line may be composed of two distinct information channels, one served by canal and the other by superficial neuromasts, and that each may be dedicated to different ...

Morphological diversity of the lateral line canal system is defined by (1) variation in the morphology and extent of development of the cranial lateral line canals; (2) the number, placement, and extent of development of the trunk canals; and (3) the distribution of superficial neuromasts on the skin of the head, trunk, and tail.

The lateral line is a collection of sense organs which are distributed over the skin or in sub-epidermal canals of the head and body of aquatic lower vertebrates. They are found in cyclostomes, fishes, larval amphibians, aquatic adult urodele amphibians and some aquatic anurans including the South African clawed toad, Xenopus laevis.

Abstract. In 1907, Ayers and Worthington reported that they found "fully formed and functional" lateral line grooves in Eptatretus stouti (Bdellostoma dombeiyi). Earlier scientists had not been able to find lateral line grooves in hagfish and the report of Ayers and Worthington has not been generally accepted in the textbooks (Hardisty, 1979, p. 10; Starck, 1982, p. 518).

The sensory ecology and neuroethology of the lateral line provides an overview of the role of the lateral line in natural fish behaviour. The approach is more conceptual than comprehensive, choosing representative behaviors and especially those that lend themselves to a neuroethological analysis. This approach provides a clear focus for the determination of the relevant parameters of the physical stimulus, the physical and physiological mediation of stimulus encoding, and a targeted approach ...
