Engineering Jargon And Civil Liability

Abstract. It is important for civil engineers to use language with care because some words have a specific meaning in the law. Examples include "guarantee," "warrant," "certify," and "ensure." These words should be avoided in reports because they can have legal definitions that increase the liability of the civil engineer. Other words such as "control," "inspect," and "supervise" can be legally interpreted to mean a level of project involvement well beyond the ...

Abstract. Personal liability is a topic to which many practicing engineers do not give serious consideration. When it is discussed, the magnitude of potential personal liability is frequently poorly understood. The reality is that engineers can be personally liable through tort law theories even when practicing for an employer. As a result, engineers place all of their assets at risk in the practice of their profession—as do many practicing professionals in fields other than engineering.
