Bengal Divided relates how a large and powerful section of Hindu society in Bengal insisted that their province be divided to create a separate Hindu homeland. The picture which emerges is one of a fragmented society moving away from the mainstream of Indian nationalism, and increasingly preoccupied with more parochial concerns.

The author of this study does not challenge these well-founded conclusions, but focuses instead on a neglected aspect of partition, namely the extent to which in the Muslim majority province of Bengal, the Hindu bhadralok or educated middle class leadership, which had pioneered the development of an all-India nationalist movement, became increasingly Hindu communalist in the decades leading up to 1947.
